preis genus insensitives sein im gegenwartsdeutschen abstract the german possessive sein is usually classified as a pronoun of the 3rd person singular masculine and neuter however in the grammatical literature some descriptions of sein instead of an expected 3rd person singular feminine possessive pronoun ihr referring to feminine antecedents can be found based on search queries in the german reference corpus dereko it is shown that the phenomenon can be empirically established while certain collocations displaying a high amount of neuter pronoun antecedents might be favorable for the use of sein alles neuter hat seinen preis everything has its price qualität feminine hat seinen preis quality has its price it turns out that the semantics of the antecedent is decisive in most examples the feminine antecedent is an inanimate noun this suggests that sein is underlyingly unmarked with respect to gender while the feminine ihr is primarily a pronoun denoting female sex and only secondarily feminine gender heterogeneous common ground based on reportative and situational evidence cf farkas bruce 2010 and two additional layers beliefs and objective facts lies can be defined by using the concept of reportative evidence i e there is a contrast between an utterance and the utterer s beliefs fallacies arise if a person is mistaken with regard to the situational evidence i e there is a contrast between her beliefs and the objective facts misunderstandings again refer to reportative evidence i e there is a contrast between the intended meaning of an utterance and the way it is understood by the hearer whereas the analysis of lies proves that the common ground is based on evidence and not on mutual belief the analysis of fallacies and misunderstandings shows that both its situational and its reportative part have to split up into one part that is clearly fixed and another part that is open to interpretation and thus endangered by these communication failures antonios tsiknakis zur ungrammatikalität von w ausdrücken in der specc position von vl komplementsätzen abstract this article addresses the impossibility of topicalization in verb final complement clauses in german in the first part of the paper existing research dealing with this phenomenon is discussed following this an alternative approach is suggested which is embedded in a general theory of finite verb movement to the left periphery and topicalization in interrogative and declarative clause types in a nutshell it will be established that both syntactic processes are trig gered by respective clause type features whose interpretation leads to an update of the question under discussion or the common ground of the context in prototypical utterance situations finally the paper is concluded with the proposition to treat the feature triggering topicalization as a functor that modifies the interpretation of the feature which is triggering verb movement and therefore presupposes its presence for reasons of interpretability Rezensionen Melitta Gillmann Narrog Heiko Bernd Heine 2018 Grammaticalization from a typological perspective Jan Kerkmann Schneider Christian 2020 Der Sprachlose Philosoph Ludwig Wittgensteins Philosophie als Lebensgeschichtliche Selbstreflexion Informationen und Hinweise von Klaus Müllner und den Herausgeber innen
